Chapter 1 by Amadeus de Novaes

There was this middle class boy, already in college, studying for some tests, thinking if he really could keep doing this effort to ensure his fake ideals of a good life are worths.

He just received a very good internship offer, at a huge company in the field of construction, and was wondering if he could just let fate decide or actually do something about it... It was hard for him to embrace a new life, with other kind of worries, less heavy, maybe. He would quit his Civil Engineering degree to make life doing his poetries? He enjoys playing his guitar and singing in a band of alternative music, he loves to read about philosophical physics and aleatory themes of the society, but loves one thing more than anything: maths. The religious part of it (?), so... We should chase an artistic life or keep his life as a calculator man? Of course he knew he could study both sides of human's knowledge, but then he would be really good in none of them. To know in a deep way, he should focus in one activity, and that's why he should be very secure about his choices.

To help himself to decide, he kept thinking in ideas that would make him a scientist and an artist at the same time: like drawing a comic book about a physical theory, in a kind of didactic way, maybe dramatizing a little bit. Or he could just create a song about some deep thoughts, philosophizing about something nice..
